

DID YOU KNOW that the same sort of chemical bonding that happens during sex or sexual activity with someone real takes place during the solo sex associated with porn?

Whether it's online, on paper or on TV, you need to know that chemicals more powerful than street drugs get released in the brain during the use of pornography, making the mind think the fantasy is a reality.

In other words,

forming chemical links that lock the whole experience into the mind. Kind of like a song is burned onto a cd, except it's an image being burned into the brain.

The problem is that it becomes practically impossible to delete those images, and the chemical release that occurs can be addictive.

Guys who think they can use porn for a while and then stop whenever they feel like it are being hit with a hard reality. What seemed like harmless entertainment turns quickly into a habit that doesn't want to break.

Dabbling in pornography starts a cycle that can easily spiral out of control. Your initial curiosity might seem harmless enough, but before you know it you could find yourself face to face with a full blown addiction.

Don't want to be labeled an addict? Stay away from porn.

Think you might be doing your future wife a favor by using pornography instead of getting involved with real-life women while you're young? Think again.

What guys realize once they try to give up their habit is that pornographic images keep on playing in their minds whether they want them there or not.

That means that while they're trying to be intimate with their new wife, all they can think about is that playmate they met online.

It wasn't intentional, but a third party just got invited into the marriage bed, and the sexual bonding that's supposed to take place between a husband and wife ends up disrupted and distorted.

Understand that a guy's porn use impacts the real woman in his life.

When wives think of their husbands being bombarded by the memories that were made using porn, it becomes near impossible to enjoy real intimacy. Your wife's not going to be interested in getting romantic with you if she thinks you've got someone else on your mind.

Too many marriages are falling apart because of husbands' past porn use. Wives feel like they've been cheated on, and the truth is—they're right.

See, sex isn't just skin on skin.

It's emotional. It's spiritual. It's as much an issue of the heart as it is a physical experience.

In addition to making babies, sex bonds a husband and wife together in marriage. In order for that marriage to be strong, the couple needs a solid, undivided relationship. Sex is part of that relationship.

Porn gets in the way because it sells a message of sex divorced from love, relationship and commitment. Porn warps the brain's understanding of what sex is supposed to be, and creates a world where married couples don't know how to experience real intimacy.

Guys are entering into marriage with the idea that they'll bond with their wives, and they're finding out that they've already bonded with a number of porn stars—leaving the real woman in their lives feeling hopelessly unable to cope.

The porn use of today is killing the marriages of tomorrow.

This is the bottom line: You can consult all the stats and studies you want, talk to real-life couples dealing with the side-effects of pornography in their marriage, and end up with the same conclusion...

There's absolutely nothing positive about using pornography.

Exposure to pornography damages lives in one way or another 100% of the time.

Not interested in even thinking along the lines of marriage yet? It still makes sense to stay away from pornography.

Guys who used to spend their time hitting the books or working on sports skills end up withdrawing from their normal routines in order to spend more time in their online fantasies once they become seduced by porn.

Plain and simple, "adult entertainment" is anything but harmless entertainment. Porn doesn't just cheat people out of healthy, real relationships. It robs its users of their time and talents.

If you think the porn industry's goal is to entertain you, it's time you knew the truth. The makers of porn are out to own you.

They want your money, they want your mind. Man, they want your soul. They want you so hooked on porn that you won't be able to stop even if you want to. That way you'll pay a high price to get your fix.

Pornographers make big bucks off of normal, everyday guys who just happened to get hooked on porn. In fact, you should know that the amount of money the porn industry is making is bigger than the total profits of professional football, baseball and basketball teams combined.*

Porn wants to rake you over the coals by stealing your money, sidetracking you away from your future plans, and swapping a strong marriage for a shaky simulation.

Want to have the best sex life possible? Save sex for your future wife, and steer clear of pornography.

Porn's a counterfeit, and it's no substitute for the sex associated with the true love and long-lasting commitment of marriage. Sex between a husband and wife is the only sex worth having.

That online fantasy world's got nothing on the real deal. Do yourself a favor, and don't give porn the time of day. That's your best bet for where you're at right now. That's what'll help you lock in an even better tomorrow.
